RE: Use of Cell Phones on Airplanes

Good Morning,

It is my understanding that you may allow the use of cell phones on airplanes in the near future.

I would like to express my extreme displeasure with this possibility. It seems as if the world is nothing but one large phone booth with people on their cell phones in public, and it is very annoying to be forced into their world while they are talking on their phone. The possibility of cell phone use being allowed on airplanes is only extending that public phone booth to one of the last safe refuges in this world, and that bothers me.

While the use of cell phones on land isn't acceptable, at least we have the option to leave the area to distance us from the person on the phone. In the air, that option is not available. The last thing I want to be faced with is being forced to sit next to a person that wants to continually talk on their phone during a long trip. Please keep in mind that most people do not care what other people think about their use of cell phones in public, and an airplane is a place where talking on cell phones will only be more aggravating.

Thank you for your consideration, and I hope and pray that you will not even consider the use of cell phones on planes. If it is that important to people, then they can use the pay phone available to them on the back of the seat. Please do not make it easier for them to use their cell phones.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. KJM,

It has come to my attention that the airing on national television of "Private Ryan", with all the profanity, has not been contested or fined by the FCC.

We all know that such vulgar language is the "norm" amongst many people (including military, high school, etc.); however, we don't need to hear it on a television program. And it certainly doesn't add to the value in the viewing. Many programs, with such language edited out, are watched and enjoyed by the American public.

This is a travesty that will set a precedent for further infringements on the American family's values.

Please, take a stand for excellent programming. Fine the network.

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

Sincerely,

Carol P. Shelton
